Introduction

Research done under the rubric of inclusive education contains a series of questions. The pursuit of answers to these questions involves methodological and philosophical challenges. The research done under this rubric is often conducted using methods that are not reflective of the real world in which inclusive education is implemented. This is because the research is often done in artificial settings, such as university classrooms, where the role of the researcher is to control the research variables.

However, in the real world, inclusive education is practiced in a variety of settings, such as schools, workplaces, and community centers. The role of the researcher in these settings is to observe and document what is happening, rather than to control the research variables.

The challenges of doing research in inclusive education settings are significant. Researchers must be aware of the potential for bias in their research, and they must be mindful of the ethical implications of their research. However, despite these challenges, inclusive education research is important because it can help to improve the quality of education for all students, including those with disabilities.
